As I posted in a note earlier, I was busy with work matters for election day. Although I was mostly radio silent, I was keeping up with what people were saying about it. Something that quickly became clear was that Lefties were extremely cocky at the start, as they have been all year. This cockiness absolutely plummeted within hours as several states swung in Trump's favor. Bear in mind that this was the very start of the election, so they weren't shocked that Trump might barely edge out Harris. They were shocked that he had any supporters at all outside of the typical heartland states. The fact that Trump absolutely dominated across the country was mind blowing to them. Subreddits dedicated to depression or suicide are currently flooded with various Leftoids whining about this & wanting to kill themselves (please).

This tells us something that many in our sphere (especially ones present for the 2016 election) already knew, which is that Lefty politics are not nearly as omnipresent as they claim it to be. 2016 showed that Leftists are extremely visible in the realms of social media, traditional media, and especially celebrity endorsements. Despite this, it doesn't quite translate into reality. RW views, from milquetoast NeoConism to outright WN ideologies have more weight behind them than many realize due to both censorship & the fact that most moderate RWs aren't as prolific & chronically online. Even though they're practically irrelevant now, I probably don't have to tell you how the old news companies like MSNBC or CNN tend to vote.

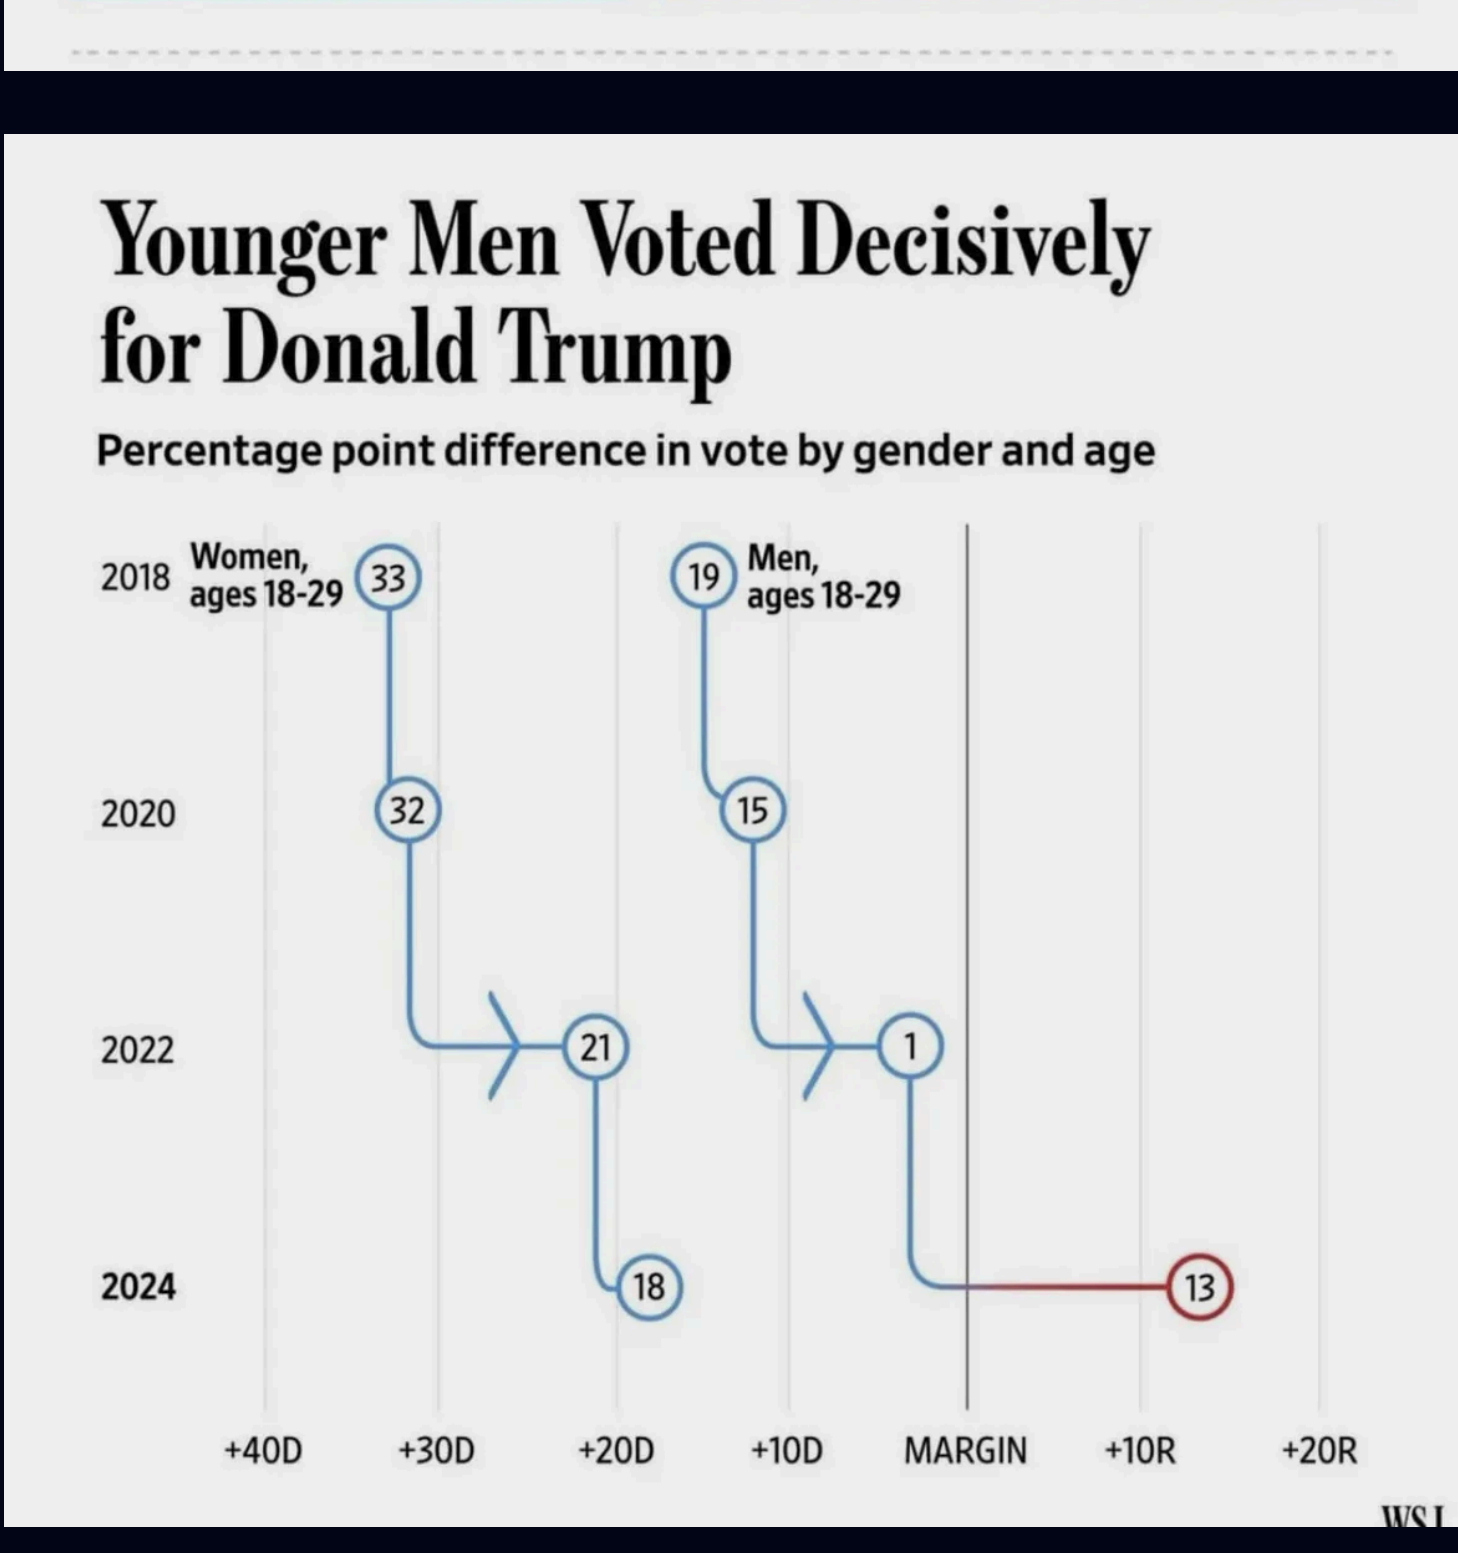

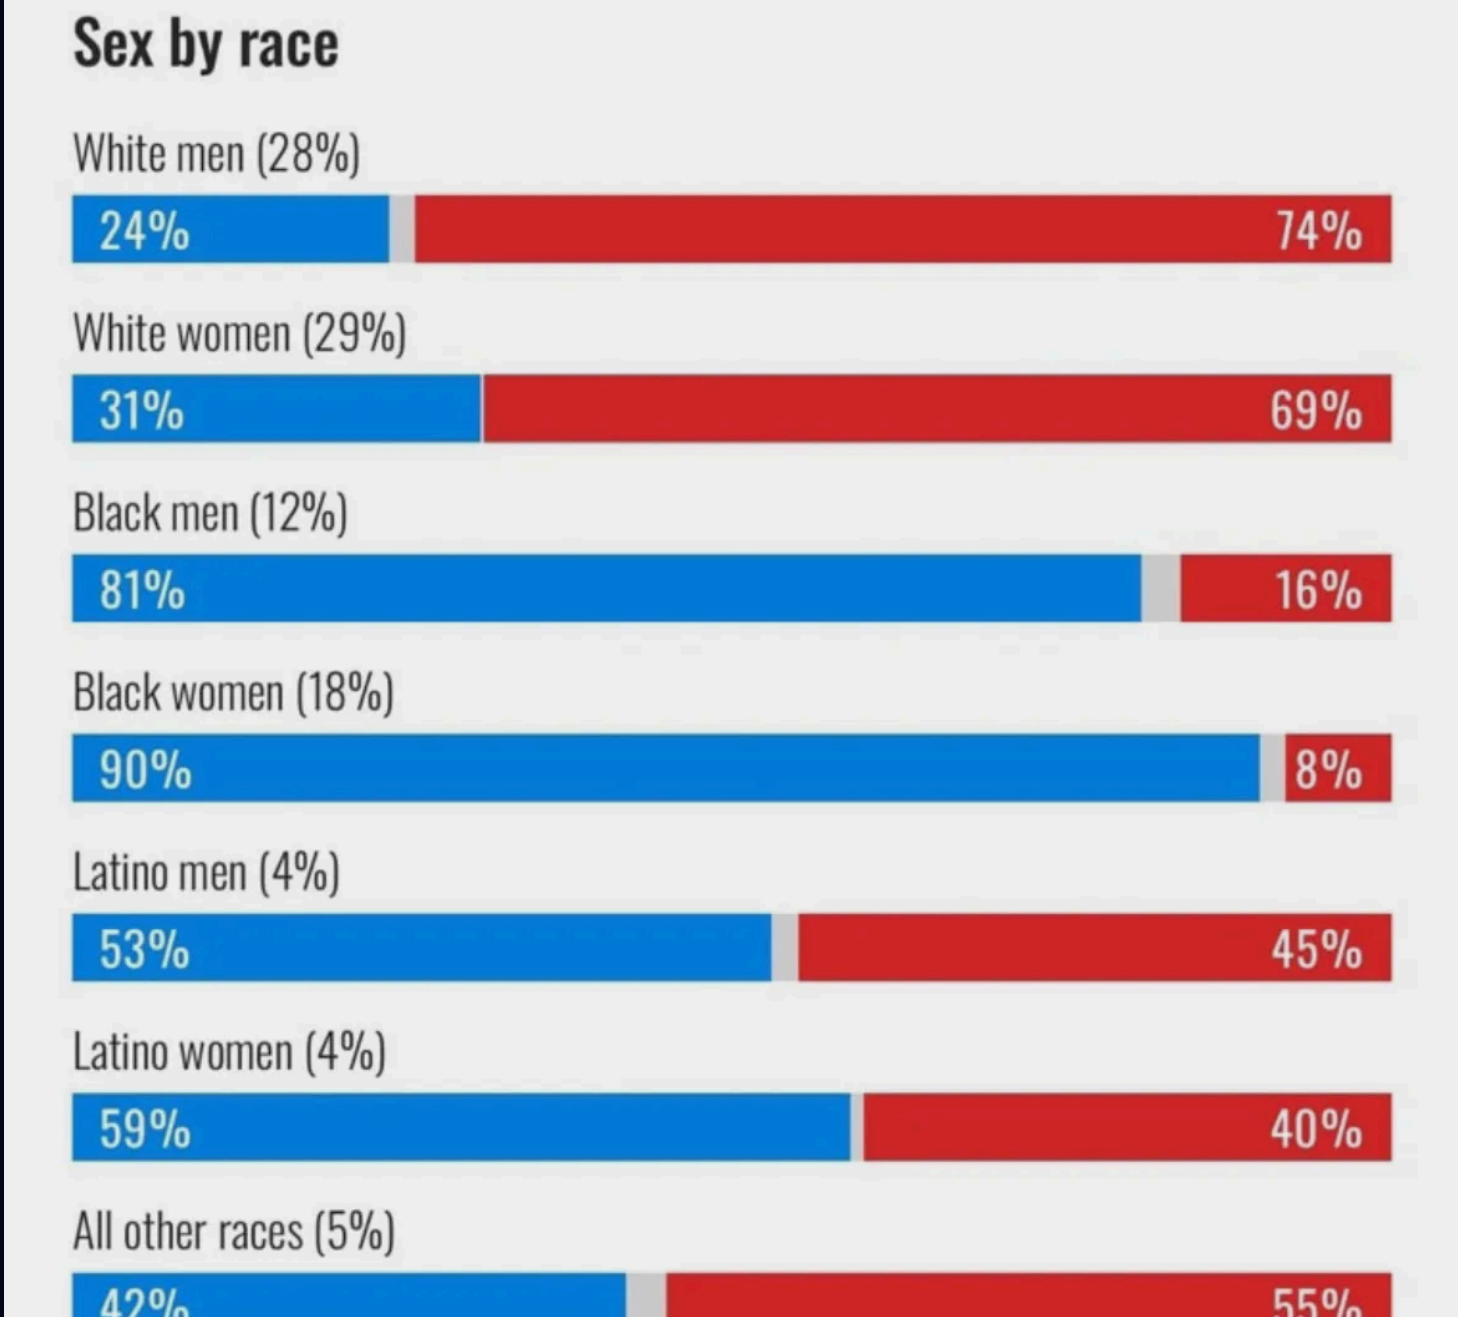

I saw a pretty funny post on Reddit of someone saying something to the effect of "Maybe we did cheat in 2020" because of how bad Kamala was doing, which was funny. It's been a good couple of years (since Musk got Xwitter) of Lefties realizing that fairly abrasive RWers are actually getting fairly popular, that people like Joe Rogan are actually just moderate centrists, & now that their beliefs are quite niche. This is actually a big thing with trannies, they're statistically minuscule but we all have to see them because they're chronically online losers that never touch grass.

Before anything else, obviously Trump isn't a be all end all. I keep seeing WNs complain about how Trump is still a Zionist & not extreme enough, but this has been common knowledge since 2018. No one is claiming that Trump is the next Hitler, just a tactical victory & a step in the right direction. Honestly, it doesn't even matter what he does during his tenure. The fact that a candidate selling official signage saying "MASS DEPORTATIONS NOW" is a good enough reason to celebrate, because it shows what the baseline RW is focused on. The more abrasive edges of the RW, from BAP to Blood Tribe, have flourished in the last several years both in the wake of Trump's first term & the harsh reaction during Biden's. These things take time, let small victories accumulate. To say that the overton window has shifted massively in the last 10 years is a huge understatement.

The biggest negatives of a Trump presidency are Judophilia & pressure release. The judophilia is obvious, Trump & the rest of mainstream Conservatives (especially the older generations) like Israel & thus Jews. It's endemic to evangelicals, but waning with each generation. The biggest problem is potential laws against antisemitism, though these are one SCOTUS ruling away from being void regardless. I don't care if we support Israel, it's just another country that's more or less aligned with general West, but the international Jew back home is always a threat. The pressure release means that White Americans might get complacent, as did the less abrasive cliques of the AltRight after 2016. This is certainly a threat, but I think we're in a much better position to keep the pressure on than we were back then. The more dissident personalities will need to be just as active as they were before. Zoomers need to keep up the Hitler TikTok edits.

Outside of that, there's not many major downsides for the RW as a whole. The evangelical menace will still persist with it's assorted nonsense, but that's another issue that's rapidly fading away as it's adherents die off.

Another thing to learn from this election is that the anti-White women rhetoric is indeed nothing more than a psyop & cope from non-White men. White men & women had almost identical voting patterns it seems, as did most other ethnic groups. This shouldn't come as a surprise to anyone except Nick Fuentes type retards & people who unironically believed the "vote for your daughters' future" propaganda from the Dems. The rest of us have been saying for years that politics follow racial lines far more than gender ones. Some noteworthy graphs I've come across:

Although there's still a slight divide, White women are currently voting about the same as White men five years ago & seem to be continuing to move right. Note the second graph includes all races. For those involved in the movement, again, this isn't a big surprise. We've already seen a lot more women coming into our various spheres than we did back in the old AltRight days & it's a trend that many have picked up on in the last couple years. Regardless of gender, we are seeing a distinct consolidation of White Americans within the MAGA crowd & beyond. When you account for how abrasive anti-White rhetoric from the Left has become, plus the fact that many Leftists have been sterilizing themselves for years, this trend becomes easy to understand & will most likely continue.

Regardless, this isn't over. The most important thing Trump can do is put in a hardliner cabinet. He's started off well with Vance (yeah I know, cringe pajeet lover, but still the best person at such a high level in recent history) so hopefully his future picks are similar. Some people were saying that he's likely to be more abrasive this term, due to everything around the 2020 election & multiple assassination attempts, which would be amazing but only time will tell. One of Trump's aims was to gut the alphabet agencies, which would be fantastic for everyone from Patriot Front to Terrorgram. That would alleviate a massive amount of pressure on the more fringe WN organizations, so hopefully he at least follows through on this.

All in all, I remain fairly optimistic about the course of White Americans. Things are turning our way, even if the country falls to the mongrel hoard. A unified White America is the best bet, even if it's a White minority.
